DAILY JOURNAL

The following pages contain a section for your daily journal. There is a section to complete each morning right when you wake up, and a section for before you go to bed. Each morning entry also gives you an exercise to complete, usually it will direct you to another part of the journal to fill out.

Things I'm grateful for...

This section is what's known as a gratitude journal¹. The idea that by habitually recognizing and recording positive aspects of our life, we can rewire our brains to focus on them throughout the day. You can list anything, no matter how small.

I've also found that a gratitude journal directed towards another individual can be of great help strengthen a relationship. I keep a separate gratitude journal about my wife. This helps me consciously recognize all of the effort she is putting into our relationship, household, and parenting. I periodically share entries with her, so she knows how grateful I am.

What's three things I want to accomplish today?

By providing myself with short term goals, I can recognize what is important to me to accomplish for the day. It makes the day less overwhelming if I'm able to break it down into what I really want to accomplish, versus what isn't as pressing and doesn't need to be done today. I don't punish myself for not achieving them. It's just a roadmap for the day – it's fine if I take a few detours.

What am I worried about tomorrow?

My mind is often plagued by persistent worries. The act of getting these concerns on paper, makes them less scary. I don't need to waste brainpower focusing on them tonight, I've written them down and can deal with them later. It's also helpful to analyze these concerns and see if they are reasonable ones.

Three great things that happened today:

Finally, I try to end the day with positivity. Again, it doesn't matter how small of a thing it was. When I use this section, I also like to note what my role was in the noted item. As an example: "I made a great meal my family enjoyed today! I'm proud because I've been working hard to improve my cooking!"
